Easter Island is a very small volcanic island (163 km²) in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. It is a five-hour flight from Santiago, the capital of Chile. There are approximately 8000 people living on Easter Island. It is well-known for being one of the most isolated places on earth and for its unusual stone moai statues. In 1995, UNESCO named Easter Island a World Heritage Site, with much of the island protected within Rapa Nui National Park.

Over the past few years, there has been an increase in tourism numbers as tourists combine trips to Chile with a visit to the Island. Many come to see some of the 900 statues that are visible around the island.

However, some local people believe that Easter Island might face problems due to an increase in tourism development. As tourist numbers grow, there are more cars around the island causing congestion. There is also an increase in waste, water contamination and sewage. Ten years ago, the island produced 1.4 tonnes of waste per year, but that figure has almost doubled to 2.5 tonnes per year.

The local government has employed an environmental advisor to complete an audit of the fragile landscape. The government hopes that, by working with commercial tourism operators, the local council and the community, any negative environmental impacts might be reduced.
